

Top Secret – how to deal with Assange

CIA special ops X department – Eyes only

The committee has spent the past week considering this matter as a national priority, and we have concluded that the best way to discredit both Assange and the organisation he created is with a personal attack.

Sources inform us that he is currently on his way to Sweden for a political meeting. We have spoken with our key people there, and have arranged for Assange to be propositioned by two attractive young women who will lure him into bed and then accuse him of rape, or if he cannot be so lured, then of some lesser sexual offence such as groping.

Ideally we would like to use a young male, preferably under age, because that would play well with our allies in the Middle East, but Assange has been tagged fairly closely by both the local police and security services in his native Australia, and it is felt in view of his well documented liking for the ladies that such a sting would lack credibility.

Our insider at Wikileaks informs us that he will probably move to the UK by the end of the year where he has access to a secret slush fund. It would be most convenient if an extradition warrant could be issued at that time. A word in the ear of a magistrate will be enough to ensure he is denied bail, and once inside the British prison system he can be dealt with swiftly and effectively.

Though British prisons are nothing like as violent as domestic ones, “nonces” are regarded as fair game, and it should not be too difficult to persuade an inmate who has nothing to lose to take him out if a small donation is made to a family member.

No one at the Whitehouse must be informed of this proposal so as to make the denial not simply plausible but water-tight.
