BBC Peddles Paedophile Ring Fantasies

CRIME FEATURED NEWS

Like the man said, you couldn't make it up. But they did, and they continue to. The BBC is scraping the barrel peddling fantasies about the mythical Westminster paedophile ring in its Newsnight programme.

We are led to believe this network was so powerful, so all-pervasive, that it was able to quash a police operation after detectives had staked out addresses for three months, using inter alia a hidden camera, and arrested a prominent MP. The MP in question was Cyril Smith, who like Jimmy Savile is now conveniently dead (though not for him) and unable to defend himself.

According to Newsnight, video footage was obtained of men abusing boys; taking part were a senior member of an intelligence agency, and would you believe police officers as well? They would, but you should exercise a little critical faculty.

Next we are told that Smith and others arrested at the scene of the crime (a sex party at which underage boys were present) were taken to a Central London police station, and then...And then nothing. Smith was released, and shortly all those concerned were told to surrender all their evidence – including photographs and videos – which then disappeared. All the officers concerned were threatened with prosecution under the Official Secrets Act if they opened their mouths. And the evidence for this is...would you believe an anonymous source, one whom it appears is anonymous even to the BBC?

A former police officer is brought in to opine on the subject; Clive Driscoll says the allegations are credible. Unfortunately, he isn't. And in comes Simon Danczuk MP to claim Smith had been investigated a number of times, but because he was protected, the police were told to look the other way.

If this claim about them being warned off is true, there might just be another, and totally innocent explanation for it, as with the recent nonsense about Satanic abuse in Hampstead, namely that the allegations were not credible, that they had been investigated previously, and that the papers were buried to protect the innocent.

How credible is all this? If Cyril Smith had indeed been arrested and taken to a Central London police station, it would have been impossible for this to have gone unnoticed because of his size. And we are led to believe that normally bullish police officers handed over all their photographs and everything else, every single piece of paperwork relating to a three month long investigation. No one contacted the press, even anonymously. Again, how credible is this?

This nonsense has been peddled for months, yet to date there has been not a single piece of credible evidence that any of the high and mighty were involved in any such paedophile rings or any such cover up. The BBC should leave this sort of fantasising to the Exaro website and the usual tabloids, that is if it wants to continue being taken seriously.
