Bolton in the North West of England was recently the site of a rather strange protest. Called “16 Days of Activism against Gender-based Violence”, it was organised by the usual suspects, and featured among other things a march. This is nothing new, this particular project has been running annually since 1991. According to the organiser, the turnout was lower this year than expected; she put this down to some people receiving rape threats. The big question here is were these threats genuine, because the most common type of rape in Bolton appears to be false rape.

In 2005, Tanya Moores was given a 12 month sentence at Bolton Crown Court for a false rape allegation against her boyfriend.

In March 2009, Lauren Chaffey was given a five month sentence at Bolton Crown Court after falsely accusing a man with whom she'd had consensual sex of raping her.

In November 2010, Amanda Bradley was given a 12 month sentence at Bolton Crown Court. She had claimed her former lover raped her. Three months later she admitted she had lied.

In June 2011, a seventeen year old girl was given a twelve month sentence by Bolton magistrates after falsely accusing an Asian taxi driver of raping her.

In October 2011, Keeley Horrocks was given a two year sentence at Bolton Crown Court after falsely accusing a man of raping her. Although he was nearly forty years her senior they had been in a relationship for months.

In February 2012, it was reported that a 16 year old girl who claimed to have been the victim of a violent rape was issued with a fixed penalty notice. Detective Inspector Gary Smith of Bolton CID was not amused.

In June 2013, Husem Patel was cleared at Bolton Crown Court of perverting the course of justice. It had been claimed he had told Jade Leech to make a false rape allegation against Zabir Khan, who had been arrested on that account. Leech admitted making this false allegation – four months after reporting it – and pleaded guilty to perverting the course of justice.

In March this year, an alleged rape reported to Bolton police the previous September was revealed to have been yet another false allegation.

Finally, in the true spirit of diversity, in January 2008, a MAN named Sajid Bharucha pleaded guilty to perverting the course of justice relating to two historical allegations against the same individual.

So it seems, ladies, there is absolutely no need for marches against male violence in Bolton. Your menfolk may not be safe, but you are. Smile luv!
